

Reading: A City Life Article

More people now live in cities than at any other point in history. In 1950, fewer than one in three people lived in an urban area; today it is more than half the world's population, and the number keeps rising every year.

Cities offer things that are harder to find in smaller towns: more job opportunities, better public transport, and a wider choice of restaurants, schools and entertainment. But city life also brings real challenges -- higher rent, more traffic, and less green space than many people would like.

Some cities are trying to solve these problems by building more parks, improving cycling routes, and encouraging companies to let staff work from home some days of the week. Whether these changes are enough remains to be seen.
